By May 1926, the pace of the story has changed. Much of the mill now stands completed, and the work has shifted from major structural construction to finishing the buildings and preparing them for operation.

Several workers can be seen on a temporary wooden platform extending along the outside of the building. One appears to be using a hoe or rake, possibly leveling or finishing concrete. A handcart rests in the foreground, while heavy timbers lie scattered across the work area, reminders that construction was still very much underway.

This photograph may show the Hemlock Screen Room, which later became the Kamyr pulp dryer automated baling area. The larger building behind it may be the No. 3 and No. 9 paper machine room. Both identifications should be considered tentative until confirmed by someone more familiar with the mill's layout.

Unlike the earlier photographs, this image captures a mill that is beginning to look familiar. Much of the temporary framework has disappeared, replaced by the permanent concrete buildings that would define the Camas Mill for decades to come
